Social Tortures—The Infant.

The baby's nemesis—colic.

Man, as a social being, at a tender age begins to be the victim of the thoughtlessness, curiosity and cruelty of his fellow beings. Il-placed and murderous pins, lacera his tender flesh; his "crying for the light" is misunderstood and anatomized, instead of calling forth kind pity as the wail of a dumb and helpless animal should.

His fresh, young palate is contaminated with sour milk; he is swathed in uncomfortable, ill-fitting garments, made by maiden aunts, not for him, but for the ideal, archetypal infant, which existed only in the minds of the well-intentioned needle-woman, and each maiden aunt of necessity had a distinct type of baby in her eye. Pause for a moment, pray, and imagine the discomfort of wearing garments, made at different periods of time, by various amateur tailors, who have never seen you. To a hardy, vigorous man this would be painful in the extreme; to a weak, young infant it must be absolute torture, when at the same time the child's teeth are sprouting through its inflamed gums, and its cheeks are covered thick with a rash.

Leaving out of consideration the fact that the child is clad with "misfits," how his sensitive feelings must be harassed when his grandmother, aunts and other female relatives surround him, crying out as one woman, "Keecher, keecher, keecher!"

"Keecher, keecher, keecher!" When his batchelor uncle presents his watch to him to be blown upon by his tired lungs, and his father, proud of his offspring, makes ludicrous faces at him. Think of the misery of the little being fresh from the angels; in a hot room, under the blankets, left to the tender mercy of a stout monthly nurse, harassed by contact with a constant succession of such little angels.

These trials through, our mannikin is put into short clothes, these a legacy from his elder brother. Now, his serious tortures begin. His eldest brother taunts him with wearing cast-off clothing, and feeding him with copper cents; or maybe allows him to play with the big Noah's ark, and the artless creature, feeling his way into the realities of the world, sucks the purple paint from the canals, and the red and yellow spots from the tigers and guinea pigs. His nose is thereupon held by merciless hands and a nauseous draught administered to him. The way and wherefore of this is never explained to him; an ex parte hearing is held, and on the evidence of the elder brother, the criminal, and the real testimony of the paint smeared upon the little nose—but of a month, judgment is delivered and executed before any one can say "Jack Robinson."

A nauseous draught is administered. And now he has begun to talk; and therefore his female relatives above-mentioned, instead of giving him the example of sensible and pure "English undeified," inundate him with a flood of baby talk. He is encouraged to bring himself into ridicule by calling a horse a "go-go," his father "dude," and a locomotive "chew-chew."

Every new-comer asks him to say who she may be, as if the little chap cared a huffon, and when the badly-taught tongue stumbles the ill-bred grown up people roar with laughter at the mistake.

Can we wonder that the mortality among infants is so great—that as soon as they get hold of the use of their hands and lungs, they do their best to express their disgust with the world in which they find themselves?
